

UC's hell-bent on reclaiming People's Park. It says it needs the land for student housing, but UC owns alternative sites it could build on. The proposed high-rise would destroy a vital natural habitat, blocking sunlight from landmarked churches and surrounding buildings. And it would deny everyone the healing power of open space. The community would lose both an historical icon and a green place to host live music, plays, workshops, recreation, rallies, and neighborhood meetings. The Park bandstand, open to all speakers and built in response to UC's anti-free speech record, would be permanently dismantled.

Over half a century ago, in the middle of a war, Berkeley residents faced police guns and the National Guard to protect the community space they had created. Now it's up to us to grow it.
